npm run check

According to the activity manual, running npm run check performs a review of the project by executing both linters, all tests, and a frontend build. This command is expected to exit without any errors to confirm that the application is functioning properly. If the check fails, the first relevant error must be read, the specific file and line located to fix the issue, and then run the command again. Ultimately, this step guarantees that the new tests pass and catches any lingering syntax, linting, or build problems across the project.
